About the Seminar

Research is a systematic and objective process of inquiry undertaken to explore, interpret, and analyze facts, with the ultimate goal of generating knowledge, solving problems, and informing decisions. Whether conducted in the social sciences, natural sciences, humanities, or applied fields, research seeks to uncover insights grounded in evidence and logical reasoning. At the core of this process lies research methodology—the structured framework that defines how research questions are formulated, data is collected, and findings are analyzed and interpreted. It determines not only the credibility of research outcomes but also the clarity, coherence, and consistency of the research process itself. As disciplinary boundaries become increasingly porous, methodological innovations have gained renewed significance in ensuring that research remains relevant, rigorous, and responsive to real-world challenges. It also considers the ethical and analytical dimensions of data collection and interpretation, demonstrating how methodological precision and the use of statistical tools contribute to the accuracy, validity, and reliability of research outcomes.
